After

We stand at the washing machine picking straw from our son's new sweater after he has tripped in a pumpkin patch and run through amaranth with his second grade friends. Our fingers ease slivers from the fibers, back then front, stomach, shoulders, arms, after a morning of angry glares, an afternoon of looking away then opening to talk about weather and people we know.

Our fingers examine this fabric for odd texture, the barbs buried deep.
