[This book (and sequels) is the story of a 75-year-old retired physicist who invents antigravity. While testing the prototype he is spotted by the RAF. Before they can do anything about him, the M8 Galactic patrol picks up the antigravity emissions and rescues him from his predicament. He agrees to join the M8GP and as part of his evaluation, he is tested for latent mental powers and is discovered to have potential abilities so great that he is rapidly promoted and in due course becomes the controller of the M8 branch of the Galactic Patrol. He prevents impending nuclear conflict between Israel and Iraq, and while performing the same task in North Korea he reunites the two Koreas. The M8GP is now widely known, and General Winters achieves a 97% popularity rating amongst public figures. He marries the widow of the previous controller, and manages to retain the relationship of the 100 year old woman he first encountered in his new life. He is given rejuvenation treatment to age 45 like all the other members of the patrol. Meanwhile, a 7000-year-old menace has finally come within danger range of our galaxy. He successfully fights off an invasion by a huge web constructed by a species of giant spider long thought to be extinct. He pays a brief visit to London to treat the two women in his life to dinner at the Savoy, but a BBC crew filming an interview spots the general and his party and it is broadcast as breaking news. Her Majesty the Queen learns of his presence in London and asks him to visit her at Buckingham Palace after his dinner engagement. He briefs the Queen on the latest threats to our galaxy and in a special ceremony she creates him Viscount Winters as a reward for his public services. The supreme Galactic controller is now terminally ill and the Galactic Council invites the general to take over the job
