Momentary Haze Bill Bice

. . . memories are like tombstones spread across an abandoned graveyard. Some are broken beyond repair; some remain, incredibly, in pristine condition; but all are relics, a symbol of that which was. I visit the graveyard from time to time and every once in a while a stone will catch my minds-eye and the past appears before me like a ghost that rises from a long forgotten grave. There is one ghost that stays forever by my side. It haunts me like a shadow that is glued to my skin. It will never leave me until I become a ghost, forever silenced in that forgotten field of hallowed dirt. Late afternoon. June Fourth, 1966. I took the life of my best friend. He was twelve years old. His name was Tony Ruminello, but everybody, including his parents, called him 'Tater'. His demise would precipitate my suicide. I would waste most of my life in perpetual deception, until I finally seized the moment and gathered the courage to deal with the inevitable consequences of my actions.
